

Salvator Rosa's Democritus and Diogenes in Copenhagen

Can Salvator Rosa's paintings of Democritus and Diogenes be seen as reflections of the artist's self-image as a Stoic painter-philosopher and of his endeavour to create sublime art? This complicated matter is elucidated in the present article.

Summary

The article places Rosa's two paintings of philosophers within a historical context, demonstrating how their subject matter and formal devices bring together and expose a range of important themes in seventeenth-century art theory. The question of the sublime is linked to the connection between the aesthetic and the ethical in the artist and the work of art, to the melancholic temperament and to the concept of genius as it appeared within the art theoretical context of the day. The article shows that the two philosopher-paintings may have been included amongst what Salvator Rosa himself regarded as sublime motifs. They can be interpreted as a public launch and presentation of the artist's new perception of the artist self, which incorporated multiple identities: Stoic philosopher, poet, satirist and painter of ethical-moral (sublime) inventions.

Articles

Ma nell' antichità non vo' ingolfarmi.

Mira, come danno aura al Buonarruoti

Non men le carte, che le tele, e I marmi.

Se i libri del Vasari osservi e noti,

Vedrai che de' pittori i più discreti

Son per la poesia celebri e noti.

E non solo I pittori eran poeti,

Ma filosofi grandi, e fur demoni

Nel cercar di Natura I gran segreti.

(from Salvator Rosa's satire L'Invidia)¹

Prologue

One of Erik Zahle's feats as curator at the National Gallery of Denmark was the acquisition, in 1936, of Salvator Rosa's monumental pendants depicting ancient philosophers.² Salvator Rosa (1615–73) was in his mid-thirties when he set out to paint Democritus in Meditation (1650–51) and Diogenes casting away his bowl (1651–52). [figs. 1-2] The decision to paint not just one, but two paintings on this vast scale should be seen in light of the fact that at this point Salvator Rosa had just returned to Rome after a decade of working in Florence. The two paintings, hereinafter also known as the pendants, were intended to call attention to his ability as a history painter, attracting clients to his newly established business. As a young artist Salvator Rosa specialised in battle scenes and landscapes inspired by the wild countryside around Naples, but he wished to be known as a history painter.³

I shall read and interpret the pendants in the light of a range of seventeenth-century art theoretical concepts and their interrelationships. This will include the concepts of virtú (virtue), the melancholic temperament, and genius as seen in relation to the sublime. The Baroque era's understanding of the sublime is characterised by its ethical dimension, for the meaning of that concept has shifted and changed over time.⁴ In antiquity and in the Baroque era the sublime was framed by the discipline of rhetoric. Scholars and artists would read Longinus's treatise on the sublime, Peri Hýpsous, (On the Sublime), which was edited as a printed book for the first time in 1554 in Greek, 1566 in Latin and in 1639 in Italian.⁵ From the time of the arrival of Nicolas Despréaux-Boileau's 1674 French translation of Longinus (Traité du Sublime), the concept became associated with a particular aesthetic that could be learned and appropriated. During the eighteenth century and the first decades of the nineteenth century, the sublime was exclusively associated with aesthetics, but in Longinus and in the Baroque readings of Longinus it also encompassed a strong ethical-cum-moral element that was associated partly with the subject (the orator, poet or artist), but also with the work and its impact on the audience.

This article addresses the possibility that Salvator Rosa might also have had philosophers in mind when he spoke of 'sublime subjects': it reviews the literary sources that Salvator Rosa may have known, and which may have shaped his perception of the two philosophers' lives and thinking. The focus then shifts to the ethical and moral aspects of Longinus's treatise, which offers a direct connection between the sublime and the ethics and lifestyles of pre-Socratic philosophers. The article also picks up on connections to the conceptual framework established by Giorgio Vasari (1511-74) concerning the status of the artist, the theme of the sublime and the perception of genius.⁶ The objective of the article is also to show how a range of formal devices such as oscuritá and amplificatio and can be linked directly to Longinus's concept of the sublime and to Vasari.

Fig. 1. Salvator Rosa: Democritus in Meditation. 1650-51. Oil on canvas. 344 x 214 cm. National Gallery of Denmark, inv. no. KMS4112. public domain, National Gallery of Denmark.

Fig. 2. Salvator Rosa: Diogenes casting away his bowl. 1651-52. Oil on canvas. 344 x 212,5 cm. National

The mute language of painting

The pendants show the two philosophers in the same forest, disregarding the fact that they did not live at the same time. They also occupy the same dusky setting where the cold white light of the moon seems to be the only source of light. Clouds drift by in the sky above, and an owl, bird of night, sits silently on a branch high above Democritus. While Diogenes is surrounded by an audience, Democritus is alone. He has just shut the pages of a large book, cradling it in his lap. Wearing an expression of wry mournfulness, he gazes inwards – his head cradled in his hand as he leans up against a sarcophagus. Among the teeming wealth of detail in this composition, Salvator Rosa has taken pains to depict a number of familiar, yet enigmatic relics from the monument culture typical of antiquity. The sheer variety of types on display makes it seem as if Salvator Rosa is eager to demonstrate the scope of his knowledge and education: here we find a tripod, an urn, a sarcophagus, a stele, and to the left is a herm in the shape of Terminus, god of transitions. To the right is a toppled stele with mysterious hieroglyphics, identified by Richard W. Wallace as a stele reproduced in Valeriano's Hieroglyphica, on which the inscription "Humanae Vitae Conditio" (the condition of human life) points to how death is a universal fact.⁷ Dead animals surround Democritus. Most of the animal carcasses have become skeletons, and by the feet of Democritus we also find a human skull between an array of books and documents showing geometric figures. In the background a human skeleton tumbles out from a desecrated grave, the totality offering an eerie reminder of the inevitability of death. [fig. 3]

Fig. 3. Skull and scrolls, signed bottom left corner. Detail of Salvator Rosa: Democritus in Meditation. National Gallery of Denmark, see fig. 1.

The darkness that envelops Democritus makes it difficult to make out all the details; even the philosopher's face resides in shadow, apart from the tip of his nose. The same dark manner of painting cloaks the details in the Diogenes painting. Diogenes's face is cut through by a diagonal shadow; perhaps Salvator Rosa has painted metaphorical shadows here and in the face of Democritus. Several of Diogenes's followers listen attentively from the gloom, and the boy who serves as the subject of his speech is at the very front of the shadowy foreground. There are countless nuances of black here, ranging from the brown-hued and reddish to green-hued, bluish and violet blacks.

In these pendants Salvator Rosa chose to create a tightly condensed pictorial space where the spectator's eye is not allowed to roam out into infinity, but is stopped at the first plane. Salvator Rosa has opted for a radical solution in the upright format of these compositions, for the figures take up only the lower half while slender tree trunks and the sky make up the uppermost part. We are in a desolate place where torn and broken trees and branches testify to the raw forces of nature as expressed in inclement weather and horrific storms. Employing an exquisite compositional device, Salvator Rosa uses the tree trunks to echo the philosophers' poses. The governing idea behind Salvator Rosa's composition unfurls itself through this device, showing how a repetition, expansion or extension - a 'principle of amplification' - intensifies and enhances the overall feel of the painting. It is via such amplificatio that Salvator Rosa achieves an effective sense of harmony and interplay in the composition and a strong visual pull between the philosophers, the tree trunks and the skies in the two works.

Typically of Salvator Rosa, the paintings were not, despite their large scale, commissioned pieces, but his own free inventions. He painted Democritus in Meditation in 1650 while staying in Monte Rufoli with friends of his, the brothers Maffei. In a letter dated 3 October 1650 Salvator Rosa says: "we are still at Monte Rufoli, and we will stay here for another eight days to accommodate a large canvas I have had to complete, and now we must wait for it to dry so that it can be rolled up".⁸ The painting was to be transported to Rome, and in March of 1651 it was exhibited in the Pantheon, which was used as a church at the time (Santa Maria dei Martiri). Salvator Rosa used the first public exhibition of the year to present his new masterpiece.⁹

Salvator Rosa had generated considerable interest in the upcoming reveal of the Democritus painting by being very secretive, barring all except one friend from access to his studio. With all this mystique surrounding the painting, its unveiling was eagerly anticipated. Rosa sought to sell the work, but was unable to fetch the price he wanted.¹⁰ A patron bought it for 250 scudi, but the deal was cancelled. Perhaps it was at this point that he decided to create a companion piece for Democritus in the form of Diogenes casting away his bowl. The Venetian envoy in Rome, Niccolò Sagredi, bought the pendants for 300 ducats at some point before 6 July 1652. He later took them to his hometown, where they remained in his family's ownership for many generations. Salvator Rosa later regretted this sale because the newly appointed papal legate, Monsignore Gaetano, would have paid 500 scudi and given the two philosopher paintings to the Habsburg king Philip IV (king 1621-65), who ruled Spain, Portugal, Naples and Sicily.

Scenes depicting ancient philosophers were popular at the time, and in 1662, long after he created the pendants, Salvator Rosa did a number of prints depicting philosophers and ascetic hermits. His paintings formed the basis for the prints depicting Democritus and Diogenes, whereas the other images - leaves showing scenes such as Diogenes and Alexander, Plato's Academy, etc. - exist only as prints. [figs. 4-5]¹¹ In Salvator Rosa's graphic oeuvre the pictures no longer act as pendants. Indeed, pairing up Democritus and Diogenes was not usual within seventeenth-century Italian painting.

Democritus omnium derisor in omnium sine desiquitur

Sabulo-Rosa Inu. fecit

Fig. 4. Salvator Rosa: Democritus in Meditation. (1662). Etching. 456 x 276 mm. The Royal Collection of Graphic Art, National Gallery of Denmark, inv. no. KKSgb13528. public domain, National Gallery of Denmark.

Diogenes Adolescentem manu bibentem
intuitus Scyphum projecit

Salazar Rosa. Inu. Scul.

Fig. 5. Salvator Rosa: Diogenes casting away his bowl. 1661-62. Etching 453 x 274 mm. The Royal Collection of Graphic Art, National Gallery of Denmark, inv. no. KKSgb13525. public domain, National Gallery of Denmark.

Research history

Democritus in Meditation and Diogenes casting away his bowl have been the subject of much art historical research. Baldinucci described the Democritus painting with particular emphasis on its transitory elements: "Democritus contemplating a large quantity of skeletons and other decayed and devoured things."¹² Erik Zahle identified the literary source of the paintings as an apocryphal letter by Hippocrates, and others have found supplementary sources such as Lucian's The Lover of Lies, or The Doubter, in which Democritus shuts himself up in a tomb in order to find the peace and quiet necessary to write.¹³ Wallace (1968) and others have discussed the vanitas iconography, identifying the monuments that surround Democritus.¹⁴ In her doctoral dissertation (1978) Wendy Wassyn Roworth offers an explanation of why Salvator Rosa chose to make pendants of Democritus and Diogenes: taking her starting point in Robert Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (1621) she inscribes the two philosophers in the familiar dichotomy vita contemplativa - vita activa, with Democritus as the meditating melancholic and Diogenes as the one who translates the thoughts of an ideal life into actual practice.¹⁵ In this sense Salvator Rosa addresses, according to Roworth, Aristotle's separation of philosophy into the contemplative and the active; Aristotle delegated physics and logics to the field of theory, whereas ethics and politics belonged to the practical sphere.¹⁶ In an aside, Salvator Rosa may also have been visually inspired by the frontispiece of Burton's The Anatomy of Melancholy, where one of the small scenes in the margin shows Democritus sitting in his garden in Abdera with a book on his lap and his head resting on his hand.¹⁷

Haskell (1980) was the first scholar to account for the public exhibitions' function as marketing vehicles that allowed artists to showcase and sell work outside the scope of the conventional and powerful patrons and institutions that commissioned work.¹⁸ This theme has subsequently been addressed in depth by Xavier F. Salomon in the catalogue for the 2010 exhibition Salvator Rosa (1615-1673) Bandits, Wilderness and Magic at the Dulwich Picture Gallery, London and at the Kimbell Art Museum, Texas.¹⁹

In the exhibition catalogue Salvator Rosa. Tra mito e magia (2008) Caterina Volpi sees Democritus and Diogenes as personifications of 'the new man', i.e. of the learned humanist who is as interested in studies of zoology as he is in anatomy, alchemy, astrology and Egyptology.²⁰ Volpi takes the Renaissance world view expressed by the Wunderkammer distinction between artificialia and naturalia and applies it to the pendants, linking them to Salvator Rosa's time in Florence where there was an established circle of clients for philosopher scenes among the city's intellectual scene - unlike in Rome, where he struggled to sell the monumental pendants at the desired price. In the same exhibition catalogue Ebert-Schifferer contextualizes the Copenhagen Democritus and Diogenes within Rosa's memento mori and whichcraft motives in relation to the Wunderkammer of that time.²¹

In 2010 Volpi, Sybille Ebert-Schifferer and Helen Langdon published the anthology Salvator Rosa e il suo tempo 1615-1673, in which Francesco Lofano writes about the iconography of the Democritus scene, pointing to hitherto unknown written sources (Tasso and Torquato Accetto) and describing the Democritus motif as the era's emblem and paradigm for the melancholic temperament.²² Caterina Volpi's monograph Salvator Rosa (1615-1673): 'Pittore famoso' (2014) with a total of 685 pages and 325 catalogued paintings, is a substantial source to scholarly knowledge on Salvator Rosa.²³ Of the Democritus in Copenhagen Volpi provides to the context and reception.

In the exhibition catalogue Salvator Rosa (1615-1673) Bandits, Wilderness and Magic (2010) Helen Langdon focuses on the vanitas theme: “[the paintings] show Democritus bewailing human vanity and corruption, while Diogenes extols the virtues of the simple life Rosa now emphasizes Diogenes the teacher”.²⁴ Langdon does not think that Salvator Rosa identified with these philosophers. Her reading of selected works on the basis of seventeenth-century aesthetic theory is rich in perspectives, and she firmly establishes that the main source for the period’s concept of the sublime is the ancient Greek treatise On the Sublime by Longinus.²⁵ According to Langdon, Salvator Rosa’s concept of the sublime is partly based on the concept of novità; the ability to think up new things and to rethink known things. His ambitions to present himself as a learned man and to cultivate the concept of novità have also been addressed by Scott.²⁶ Langdon also emphasises the concepts of rapture and transport, fear and horror, and she reads an aesthetic of the sublime into Salvator Rosa’s landscapes from the 1660s and into the peculiar painting Pan and Pindar (1666, Ariccia, Palazzo Chigi) while also providing an introduction to the reception of Longinus in Rome around this time.²⁷ In her account of the reception of Longinus in mid-seventeenth century Rome, Langdon calls particular attention to a book from the Barberini library: Leone Allacci’s De erroribus magnorum virorum in dicendo (1635).²⁸ Salvator Rosa moved in learned and scholarly circles in Florence and Rome, and his patrons included highly cultured families such as the Brancaccios in Naples, the Medici in Florence and the Omodei family in Milano.²⁹ As was mentioned earlier he was friends with the learned Maffei brothers, Giulio and Ugo, and was a regular visitor to their home in Volterra. He did, however, have one friend in particular, Giovan Battista Ricciardi (1624–86), on whom he relied in his work with different subject matter and the interpretation of literary sources.³⁰

The question is whether one can regard this philosopher duo as a reflection of Salvator Rosa’s own ideal perception of himself as a painter-philosopher and painter-poet, picking up the mantle from great Renaissance artists such as Michelangelo and role models from classical antiquity who also worked simultaneously with visual arts and epic poetry. This is exactly the kind of self-image that Salvator Rosa evokes in the three stanzas from his satire Invidia (Envy), quoted at the beginning of this article. Salvator Rosa wrote several satires and envious colleagues accused him of not having written the satires himself. To defend himself Salvator Rosa wrote Invidia, pointing out that ever since antiquity many eminent artists have worked concurrently as painters, sculptors, philosophers and poets. Michelangelo, whom he calls by his first name, Buonarruoti, is explicitly named as an example, and Vasari’s books are listed as a reference. Add to this the fact that Salvator Rosa’s ambition was to achieve sublimity, and it becomes natural to turn our gaze to the classical source of knowledge of rhetorical and poetic sublimity – the treatise by Longinus – and its popularisation through some of the art theory concepts we see at play in Vasari’s treatise.

Literary sources

The Greek philosopher Democritus (circa 460–400 BC) is among the pre-Socratic natural philosophers whose thinking was concerned with cosmology, that is with the creation of the world and the origins of all things. Sixteenth and seventeenth century art established a tradition for depicting Democritus as the laughing philosopher, in contrast to Heraclitus, the weeping philosopher.³¹ Their contrasting moods were responses to the same issue: the folly of man.

According to Erik Zahle, the written source behind Salvator Rosa’s Democritus is an apocryphal letter from the physician Hippocrates to his friend Damagetus, relating the story of a visit to Democritus in Abdera.³² Hippocrates found the philosopher in his garden, writing a book about the melancholic temperament and madness. Scattered on the ground around Democritus was an array of animal carcasses he had dissected in order to establish where this atra bilis, this black bile or melancholy, was located in purely anatomical terms. He was also surrounded by books, and on his knees he held a large tome, at turns “writing eagerly, then resting for a long while, sunk in solitary contemplation”. In Salvator Rosa’s painting Democritus is not shown in his garden, but alone in a graveyard with ancient monuments.³³

In Salvator Rosa’s time, the historical treatise written by Diogenes Laërtius (circa 200 AD) was one of the more widespread sources of knowledge about Greek philosophy. Even though Laërtius’s history of philosophy is not always reliable, it remains one of posterity's key sources of knowledge about the lives and thinking of the Greek philosophers because so much of the philosophers' own written production has been lost - if indeed it ever existed, given that much philosophical enterprise was based on oral discourses and oral tradition. Perhaps Salvator Rosa has also used Laërtius as a source.

Democritus is best known for his prophetic natural philosophy stating that everything is made up of atoms. According to Laërtius, Democritus not only wrote treatises on the origins of the world; he also wrote prolifically on subjects such as moral ethics, physics, mathematics and geometry, music, cooking, agriculture, the art of war and painting.³⁴ Through references in Horace we know that before Plato, Democritus described poetic inspiration as a kind of rapt enthusiasm.³⁵ Laërtius sums up Democritus's moral philosophy as follows:

*The chief good he asserts to be cheerfulness; which, however, he does not consider the same as pleasure; as some people, who have misunderstood him, have fancied that he meant; but he understands by cheerfulness, a condition according to which the soul lives calmly and steadily, being disturbed by no fear, or superstition, or other passion*³⁶

Democritus's philosophy of life states that we should aim for attitudes of modesty and duty; such a view of life will pave the way for inner peace and a sense of harmonious equilibrium. Much of this philosophy of life was incorporated in Stoic philosophy, and perhaps this is why Salvator Rosa was interested in this particular philosopher, portraying Democritus as a thinker indulging in solitude by choice. For Salvator Rosa may well be depicting Democritus as the laughing philosopher - a moniker given to him back in antiquity - but his smile takes on a melancholy quality due to his pensive attitude. Rosa has portrayed his Democritus as Laërtius describes him: as a philosopher who has withdrawn to a secluded graveyard.

It was said of Diogenes of Sinope (circa 400-325 BC) that he lived 'like a dog', which lent its name to the Cynic school of Greek philosophy of which he was a founder (Kynikos: Greek for 'doglike').³⁷ Diogenes placed emphasis on setting himself free from all those things that were conventionally seen as good things in life: a roof over one's head, nourishing and good food, some money put by. Instead Diogenes celebrated the beauty of the soul, striving for virtue in the form of moral and political virtue, which was considered a sign of particular excellence and skill.³⁸ Diogenes rolled himself in the scorching hot sands in summer and embraced the snow-clad statues in winter in order to harden himself for an ascetic life.³⁹ In Laërtius's biography Diogenes is praised as an excellent orator who kept his audiences spellbound and could easily convince them on any given matter.⁴⁰ He held daily discussions with his students and followers.⁴¹ Laërtius relates how Diogenes deliberately offended absolutely everyone; he would insult fellow philosophers such as Plato, but he would also mock women.⁴²

The episode shown in Salvator Rosa's painting is one of the many anecdotes told by Laërtius about the life of Diogenes, but the story can also be found in a slightly different form in an apocryphal letter from Diogenes himself to the cynic Crates.⁴³ All that Diogenes owned was a bag for food, a drinking cup and a spoon. When Diogenes saw a child drinking water out of its hands, he threw away his cup, saying "A child has beaten me in plainness of living".⁴⁴ He similarly cast away his spoon when he saw a child eating lentil gruel with a small piece of hollow bread. After these episodes he arrived at the following conclusion: "Everything belongs to the gods; and wise men [i.e. philosophers] are the friends of the gods. All things are in common among friends; therefore everything belongs to wise men".⁴⁵ He is supposed to have stated that the tragic curse had come upon him, for that he was houseless and citiless, a piteous exile from his dear native land; a wandering beggar, scraping a pittance poor from day to day. And another of his sayings was that he opposed confidence to fortune, nature to law, and reason to suffering.⁴⁶ Courage, nature and reason are guiding lights in Diogenes's ethics. Similar guidelines also appear in the Stoics, which used to say that it is human nature to use reason. To the Cynic Diogenes and to the Stoics, the good life was a life of virtue; they understood virtue as the sum of the traits that enable mankind to live by his nature rather than by convention. In Diogenes we see the early beginnings of the idea that the purpose of life is to enter a mental state characterised by being set free from material goods and from other people's opinions concerning good manners and proper conduct. In Stoic and Epicurean thinking this idea evolved towards the position that happiness relies on setting yourself free from things you can lose, such as material goods and status symbols. In this way Diogenes's thoughts on ethics came to be important to these schools of philosophy, which incorporated them in somewhat modified form.⁴⁷

What impact did the old philosophers have in Salvator Rosa's own day? The most important exponent of the wave of Stoicism seen in the Renaissance and the Baroque would probably be Justus Lipsius (1547-1606), a Flemish humanist and classical philologist who spent long periods living and working in Rome. Lipsius was the first to make comparative studies of the doctrines of Stoicism and Christianity.⁴⁸ Lipsius was driven by a wish to find a shared fundamental starting point in all major ethical-moral codes. To Lipsius the Christian 'truths' were highlighted and made clearer by the study of Stoicism and of ancient philosophy in general. Lipsius's interest in Epicurus, Aristotle and their roots in Plato's philosophy was as deep as his interest in and study of Seneca, Zeno and other Stoics.

The ideal self-image

On several occasions Salvator Rosa declared, in his literary and painted output both, that he was a Stoic for whom ethical-moral matters were a lodestone. One example would be the satire La Pittura, in which he describes himself as a painter-poet who worked from an honest, pure white heart that was not short of love.⁴⁹ In the same satire Salvator Rosa indirectly states that his objective is to effect a moral invention of the grand manner, one in which there is no place for superbia (pride, superiority) or arrogance.⁵⁰

A self-portrait in The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, includes a table with a book by the Stoic philosopher Seneca.⁵¹ On the book is a skull which Salvator Rosa is in the process of furnishing with a Greek inscription: "Behold. Whither? When?" On the desk we also find a cartelino with the inscription: "Salvatore Rosa dipinse nell'Eremo / e dono a Gio: Batt Ricciardi / suo Amico" (depicted by Salvator Rosa in the lonely place / and given to Giovanni Battista Ricciardi / his friend). The word Eremo comes from the Greek 'erémos', which means a lonely, empty place (in a positive sense - an hermitage or retreat). Perhaps Salvator Rosa is referring to the Maffei brothers' country house, Monte Rufoli, for the painting was created around 1647, a time when Salvator Rosa and Ricciardi often stayed with the Maffei brothers. It was also during this period that Salvator Rosa worked at Monte Rufoli on what would become the National Gallery's large painting of Democritus. In both these works Rosa made the night-time moon the only source of light in his picture.

Fig. 6. Salvator Rosa: The Genius of Salvator Rosa. Etching 457 x 275 mm. National Gallery of Art.

Salvator Rosa's self-image is displayed in all its facets in an allegorical engraving with the title The Genius of Salvator Rosa, where a sign at the bottom of the composition offers a comprehensive description: "Ingenuus, Liber, Pictor Succensor, et Aequus, / Sporator Opum, Mortisque. hic meus est Genius. / Salvator Rosa" [translated by Wallace as: "Sincere, free, fiery painter, and equable, despiser of wealth and death, this is my genius. / Salvator Rosa"].⁵² [fig. 6] The scene is set in a solitary graveyard, but instead of a melancholy philosopher we find Salvator Rosa himself, leaning upon a cornucopia from which money tumbles out onto the bare earth. Wearing a crown of leaves on his head, he receives or gives his "sincere, pure white heart" to a woman holding a dove - a personification of sinceritá (sincerity) - and at the same time Salvator Rosa receives the hat and sceptre of liberty from libertá (liberty).⁵³ The other allegorical figures posing across from Salvator Rosa are la pittura (the art of painting), a Stoic philosopher holding a set of scales symbolising equilibrium, and a satyress representing satire as a literary format.

It almost goes without saying that Diogenes and Democritus, both of whom had had such great impact on the Stoic view of life, were role models for Salvator Rosa. They were natural subjects for his new ethical-heroic vein of painting, particularly as he chose to depict episodes from the lives of Diogenes and Democritus that resonated with the philosophical ethics of Stoicism. Would Salvator Rosa have seen this philosopher duo as sublime subject matter? Diogenes gives us the answer when he places the wise, i.e. philosophers, on a par with the gods, making them his friends and telling them that "what is yours is also mine".⁵⁴ Like the poet's transcendent verse and the gods' doings, the thinking of these two philosophers belongs to the highest strata that only the sublime can reach. With his sheer originality, borne up on the wings of his imagination, Salvator Rosa places himself right in the slipstream of philosophers, poets - and indeed of the gods themselves.

Salvator Rosa had a particular interest in philosophers as artistic subject matter, and perhaps we may read his choice of Democritus and Diogenes as a reflection of his own self-image: according to Aristotelian tradition, the artist, the poet and the philosopher all shared a sombre mind. In Longinus the sublime denotes a greatness of spirit - magnanimity, megalopsychía - and in order to create feats of sublime (oratorical) art the practitioner must possess magnanimity.⁵⁵ Might one conclude that the paintings of Democritus and Diogenes reflect Salvator Rosa's self-image as an artist, one where sublime feats rest on magnanimity, a greatness of spirit in the artist himself?

The sublime

Salvator Rosa used the Italian term sublime in his writings, expressing a hope that his own art was sublime.⁵⁶ In his satire La Poesia he also speaks of sublime places and sublime subjects addressed by Pythagoras and other philosophers.⁵⁷ In La Pittura the moral invention of the grand manner is presented as the greatest possible goal an artist can strive for; what Salvator Rosa also calls ethical and heroic.⁵⁸ Salvator Rosa's primary artistic ambition was undoubtedly to create something sublime; to work with sublime subject matter in the moral tenor of the grand manner.

Longinus's treaty on the sublime, Peri Hýpsous, has traditionally been acknowledged for its major significance to art criticism and aesthetics in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. In art history the concept of 'the sublime' has often been employed in relation to art from the Enlightenment period, Classicism and most recently the postmodern era, always with shifts in meaning that reflect changing views among philosophers such as Edmund Burke (1729-97), Immanuel Kant (1724-1804) and many subsequent thinkers.⁵⁹ This is because Longinus's writings did not become known in wider circles until the arrival of the aforementioned 1674 French translation by Despréaux-Boileau.

Recent decades have seen a renewed interest in the concept of the sublime, followed by a reassessment of the impact of Longinus's treatise during the period prior to Despréaux-Boileau.⁶⁰ Scholars have become aware that in the early modern era, in the sixteenth and up through the seventeenth centuries, a concept of the sublime existed within painting, one that tapped the rich sources of antiquity, first and foremost Longinus.⁶¹ What is more, new studies suggest that this treatise was not only known and used among scholars of the arts in Rome in the mid-seventeenth century, but that it was also used by e.g. Vasari in his Le Vite, which was first published in 1550, with an expanded edition published in 1568.⁶² Given that Salvator Rosa often referred to Vasari when justifying his artistic project (cf. the three stanzas from the satire Invidia at the beginning of this article), it is also relevant to include Vasari when contextualising the pendants within an ethical concept of the sublime.

Longinus

Philologists disagree on the actual identity of 'Longinus', which means that they also disagree on when the treaty Peri Hýpsous was written. The text has survived in a version where the title page bears the text: "Dionysius Longinus On the Sublime", whereas the table of contents says: "Dionysius or Longinus", which has been interpreted as an 'either or', signifying that the author is either Cassius Longinus, a Greek literary scholar from the third century AD, or Dionysius of Halicarnassus, a critic from the first century BC.⁶³ The most widely accepted theory among philologists is that the treatise was written during the first century BC in Hellenistic Greece. Some scholars doubt the antique origin.⁶⁴ In any case the reading is made challenging by a difficult style of writing and many lacunae, small and large, throughout the text. Some estimate that these missing parts account for approximately one third of the original Greek text.⁶⁵

To Longinus, the objective was not merely to write yet another instructive book on the art of oratory. It is not just a didactics on rhetoric, even though its target audience consisted of practitioners of this art: orators, politicians and judges. There is one crucial difference between Longinus's concept of the sublime and those that followed after: Longinus's idea of the sublime has both aesthetic and ethical or moral aspects, whereas later concepts of the sublime are exclusively concerned with aesthetic theory. Longinus does not define the concept of the sublime directly, but offers a range of characteristic traits instead: the sublime has to do with a special distinction and excellence of discourse; it is the one thing that is crucial in order to win the laurels of eternal fame.⁶⁶ He asks his reader whether absolutely anyone can achieve sublimity, answering his own question with a no - but everyone feels it when it is present.⁶⁷ He takes his starting point in anthropology: what everyone agrees is sublime, is indeed sublime. The sublime has a universal effect, meaning that the truly sublime will have its effect on everyone and at any time.⁶⁸ In other words, Longinus looks at what man feels and how he responds. If you quickly forget a given poem or the orator's speech, or if they fall apart upon closer inspection, then those things are not sublime.

Nature - Technique

In chapter 8 of his treatise, Longinus lists five sources of the sublime.⁶⁹ His focus on the orator's or poet's innate, inborn gifts is the one aspect of Longinus's concept of the sublime that most clearly sets it apart from its antecedents and from later periods. The moral-ethical aspect or the artist's possession of innate virtue as a prerequisite of achieving sublimity also emerges among the five sources he specifies: 1) the power of forming "Boldness and Grandeur in the Thoughts"; 2) "the Pathetic, or the Power of raising the Passions to a violent and even enthusiastic degree"; 3) the due formation of figures of thought and expression; 4) noble diction; and 5) the dignified and elevated composition of sentences.⁷⁰ The grandeur of thoughts can be unfolded through compositional devices, i.e. by exercising good judgment in the selection and combination of details and by means of the aforementioned 'principle of amplification', that is a gradual accumulation and intensification.

Longinus makes an interesting distinction between the first two sources and the latter three: "and these two being genuine Constituents of the Sublime, are the Gifts of Nature, whereas the other sorts depend in some measure upon Art."⁷¹ Categorising the first two sources of the sublime as gifts of nature represents a remarkable new departure compared to other theories of the sublime from the era.⁷² With this move, Longinus arranges the two categories of sources of the sublime in accordance with two familiar dichotomies in the worldview of antiquity: natura/phýsis versus ars/techne.⁷³ Natura/phýsis belongs to nature and the realm of the natural, in this case the orator or poet's innate gifts of nature. By contrast, ars/techne belongs to the realm of the man-made or that which man can learn.

Virtus

In his introduction Longinus discusses how one may improve one's own nature in order to achieve spiritual greatness - a powerful mind. Mastering the technique (ars/techne) is not enough; cultivating one's innate virtue is a prerequisite for achieving sublimity. The ethical theme of the sublime, dependent on virtue, is addressed again with renewed intensity in the final chapter of the treatise.⁷⁴ Here, too, Longinus shows himself to be a Platonic thinker.⁷⁵ The concept of virtue - Latin virtus, Italian virtú - denotes a wide range of meanings that go far beyond the connotations evoked by the word today. In antiquity the word held the meaning under consideration in Plato's The Republic.⁷⁶ In Salvator Rosa's day it became a key concept in the definition of a new ideal artist figure because it has to do with a person's magnanimity, vast intelligence, talent, and exemplary manner of thought and action.⁷⁷

The dimension of virtue becomes particularly evident in Longinus's concept of the sublime in the last chapter of his treatise, which bears the title "The Scarcity of sublime Writers accounted for".⁷⁸ The chapter is written as a dialogue conducted with an unnamed (Stoic?) philosopher who is speaking to an assembled audience when he is interrupted by Longinus's first-person narrator. They discuss the reasons behind the decadence of the day: is it, as the philosopher states, due to the loss of public rhetoric as a result of the democratic form of government? Or is it, as Longinus states in his countering thesis, a general ethical-moral decline that will automatically prompt a decline in Hýpsos (the sublime)? This discussion was a recurring theme in literature at the time.⁷⁹

Longinus presents the position that the corrupted state of genius might have more to do with an inner state of mind than with external factors. Our internal war, the urges of mind and body, prevents the sublime from coming to fruition. Among these urges he particularly points to greed and extravagance as the vices that lead mankind into the worst kind of slavery.⁸⁰ Longinus tells the philosopher and the assembly that he has given the matter a lot of thought and has arrived at the conclusion that those who worship money cannot protect their souls against the vices that are so closely associated with wealth, because extravagance will always be its companion. With these follow the other progeny of wealth: ostentation, vanity and luxury.⁸¹ These vices give birth to tyrants and makes the soul groan with pain under the weight of insolence, injustice and the most arrogant of impertinence. The corrupted state spreads like a disease, dulling virtue and the facilities of the soul, and the spirit is lost. Longinus continues his speech by stating that when man has become so preoccupied with the mortal, worthless part of himself, when he has stopped cultivating virtue and polishing what is truly noble, which is the soul, then reason and genius will fall into ruin. To him, it is the soaring flight of the soul - set free and cultivated by years of toil - that paves the way for the not only completely excellent, but also exalted and sublime performance.

Vasari's art theory concepts

In sixteenth century Italian painting, sublimity was associated partly with grandeur and magnificence.⁸² This grandeur might concern the artist's skill in terms of style, the scale of the format, the wealth of detail, the poses of the figures or a particular colour scheme - but it might also reside in breaking rules. Sublimity was associated with the experience of that which leaves you breathless with awe, but which also evokes a sense of enigma. The perception of the sublime was closely associated with a redefinition of the craft of painting within the social fabric, and during the Renaissance painting moved up the rungs of the ladder so that it was no longer regarded as a trade, but as one of the free arts, artes liberales. Painting became intellectualised, and so artists won access to the intellectual elite of society.

Fig. 7. Albrecht Dürer: Melancholia I. 1514. Copperplate. 255 x 204 mm. The Royal Collection of Graphic Art, National Gallery of Denmark, inv. no. KKSgb4589. public domain, National Gallery of Denmark.

With the artist biographies in Vasari's Le Vite we become familiar with a range of art theory concepts that helped define the new type of artist to which Salvator Rosa refers in the stanzas from the satire Invidia quoted at the beginning of this article. In Salvator Rosa's time these concepts remained valid. One of the central concepts for his ambitions as a painter was that of nobiltá - a particular excellence that a work of art can only possess if its creator has remarkable natural (i.e. inborn) abilities.⁸³ The concept of nobiltá is associated with aesthetic and ethical parameters such as grazia – the grace of a work of art and spiritual artistic freedom; bellezza – a perfect exterior and interior beauty of the soul, which can be expressed in the appearance of a figure; facilità – facility, ease, a gracefully effortless manner of painting. Another concept closely associated with that of nobiltá is the aforementioned concept of virtú, which had far more wide-ranging meaning in Salvator Rosa's own day than it does today.⁸⁴ Virtú was an essential concept for the new artist identity because it encompassed, as has already been touched upon, a range of traits that are innate, given by nature irrespective of ancestry, inheritance and wealth. Virtú was also, as we shall see, of key importance to the idea of genius and the definition of the sublime.

Melankoli – virtú – oscuritá

Melancholy found little favour with the ancient Stoics, for it might escalate and become paralysing, impeding the free flow of creativity.⁸⁵ During the Renaissance, the Reformation theologian Philipp Melanchthon (1497-1560) also described the melancholic temperament in negative terms. The Renaissance and Baroque eras' positive concept of creative melancholia takes its starting point in a passage in the pseudo-Aristotelian treatise Problems, claiming that all great men are melancholics.⁸⁶ The ability to think creatively, to be ingenious and truly distinctive was even seen to be governed by and predicated on the melancholic temperament. The seeds of this positive view of the dark temperament may also have resided in Christianity's appreciation of the asceticism of monastic life.

The first artist to incorporate the melancholic temperament in a positive depiction of the artist self is the German Renaissance artist Albrecht Dürer (1471-1521). In his famous engraving Melancholia I (1514, The Royal Collection of Graphic Art, the National Gallery of Denmark) he created a personification of Geometry (one of the free arts) and Melancholy in a single figure. [fig. 7] Knowing that Dürer was keen on measurements, proportions, harmonious numbers and central perspective, as is evident in his treatise Underweysung der Messung from 1525, the leap from the engraving's allegorical composition to Dürer's ideal self-image as a creative artist is short.⁸⁷ There can be little doubt that Dürer placed himself in the slipstream of Plato and Longinus when he ascribed the deepest source of the artistic imagination to an ability that could not be learned, but only achieved through the gift of inspiration, which was the reserve of just a few.⁸⁸

Fig. 8. Rembrandt van Rijn: Sheet of studies: head of Rembrandt, beggar couple, heads of old man and old woman, etc. c. 1631. Etching. 10 x 10,5 mm. The Royal Collection of Graphic Art, National Gallery of Denmark, inv. no. KKSgb8931. public domain, National Gallery of Denmark.

If we consider parallels closer to Salvator Rosa's own day one might point to Rembrandt (1606-69). The Dutch master believed that the melancholic mind was also the hallmark of the creative imagination. In several painted or etched self-portraits he addressed the darkly sombre mind as an aspect of the artist identity, depicting it through metaphorical use of shadow.⁸⁹ [fig. 8] In an etching featuring a range of different sketches seemingly brought together at random, the smouldering darkness conjured up by the needle includes a shadowy self-portrait amongst an array of beggars and miserable figures. It is possible that Salvator Rosa was familiar with the master prints of both Dürer and Rembrandt.

Wallace has demonstrated that in his allegorical self-portrait and the painting of Democritus, Salvator Rosa entered into a dialogue with an engraving by Giovanni Benedetto Castiglione (1609-64) from around 1645-48.⁹⁰ [fig. 9] The engraving carries the inscription "Ubi Inletabilitas Ibi Virtus" ("Where there is melancholy there is virtue"). A female personification of Melancholy is shown surrounded by symbols of science. A dog, an animal that was often linked to the melancholic temperament within the cosmological worldview of the era, is tied to the monument at which the woman sits. In this work, Benedetto Castiglione associates the melancholic temperament with virtù.

Fig. 9. Giovanni Benedetto Castiglione: Ubi Inletabilitas Ibi Virtus. c. 1645-48. Etching. 216 x 112

In Salvator Rosa's day one would sometimes see a correlation between the positive view of melancholy and a particular manner of painting that was dominated by dark colours and an absence of crisp contours.⁹¹ This manner of painting was the so-called oscuritá, an extreme version of chiaroscuro. Both techniques leave the spectator with a sense that he or she has not seen everything; what is hidden in the darkness? This enigmatic quality might also extend to the subject matter - what is the painting truly about?⁹²

Conclusion

What might Salvator Rosa have been thinking when using terms such as sublimity and sublime subject matter? The objective of this article was to elucidate this question by reviewing those parts of Longinus's treatise that address ethics and the concept of virtú, thereby pointing to the complex connections that Salvator Rosa saw, consciously or subconsciously, between the melancholy, passive Democritus, the ascetic, active Diogenes and the Longinian sublime. Might one say that the Democritus and Diogenes paintings manifest the sublime as an artistic programme? Might one say that the paintings concern themselves with the sublime, virtú, melancholy, oscuritá and genius? Perhaps the National Gallery's philosopher duo might also be seen as a reflection of Salvator Rosa's own ideal self-image. Salvator Rosa was familiar with the thoughts on ethics and virtú current at the time, perhaps not directly from their original source, but certainly through the discourse of learned friends and through the general incorporation and 'Christianisation' of key concepts of ancient philosophy via neo-Stoicism.

As one stands before Salvator Rosa's pendants at the National Gallery one is struck by how dark the two paintings are. Both compositions are shrouded in oscuritá, demanding a little extra from the spectator's visual faculties and requiring them to accustom the eyes to observing all the details in the dark areas. Much of the palette is made up of variants of black mixed with other colours, combining to form a very rich, dusky colour scheme. The paintings also demand a great deal of prior knowledge on the part of the spectator: unless you are very well versed in the life stories of the two philosophers, the themes are not immediately apparent as the artist has not used well-established iconography. This contributes to the overall oscuritá in the sense of mystery - a key concept within the terminology of the sublime presented in Vasari's artist biographies, and one that was closely related to the melancholic temperament, the hallmark of artists and philosophers alike. This 'learned' approach not only identifies Salvator Rosa as a painter-philosopher; it also requires special insight on the part of the spectator.

The composition places figures, tree trunks and darkness in a harmonious interplay of details and totality, thereby drawing on the rhetorical device of amplificatio, amplification, which according to Longinus is one of the paths orators can take as they pursue sublimity. Another element crucial to our understanding of Salvator Rosa's philosopher duo is the mutually complementary concepts of virtú, melancholy, oscuritá, genius and sublimity. The philosopher motif in itself represents the melancholic temperament, especially Democritus with his smiling yet sad expression. He can be said to be doubly afflicted, for the object of his own studies is the anatomy of that very temperament.

This study of the National Gallery's philosopher duo has given rise to the hypothesis that Salvator Rosa envisioned his juxtaposition of the meditative Democritus and the ascetic Diogenes because he regarded the two Greek philosophers as images of his own Stoic artist persona; a self-image where concepts such as nobility and virtú were omnipresent in his endeavours to create sublime art. The grandeur of thought unfolds itself through form and content. Perhaps Salvator Rosa was aware of Longinus's treatise, of his thoughts on the sublime and on how virtú was a cornerstone of that concept. Salvator Rosa wanted to create sublime art when he secluded himself at Monte Rufoli, an artist-philosopher eager to do his very best.

So where can one see Salvator Rosa's sublimity in the pendants? In the construction of the ethical-heroic philosopher motif and in the choice of juxtaposing Democritus and Diogenes; in a special principle of composition that adopts the rhetorical device of amplificatio; in the interpretation of oscuritá, which refers partly to a severely restricted palette of dark colours, to an enigmatic iconography and to a dark temperament characteristic of the artist and philosopher as types. □

Post scriptum: I wish to acknowledge the Novo Nordisk Foundation for funding during the preparation of this article

Translation by René Lauritsen

The top image is a detail of Salvator Rosa: The Genius of Salvator Rosa. National Gallery of Art, Washington, see fig. 6.

Notes

1. Salvator Rosa: Satire di Salvator Rosa. Ristampate a spese di G. Balcetti, Londra 1791, ECCO Print Editions (reproduction after British Library), Literature and Language, Hampshire 2016, pp. 181–182.
2. The paintings were bought from the Copenhagen art dealer Tjørnelund & Rossum; concerning their acquisition and genesis, see Erik Zahle: “Tilvækst af italiensk barok”, Kunstmuseets Aarskrift 1937, pp. 145-155; Harald Olsen: Italian Paintings and Sculpture in Denmark, Munksgaard, Copenhagen 1961, pp. 85-86.
3. Helen Langdon, Xavier Salomon og Caterina Volpi: Salvator Rosa, exhibition catalogue, the Dulwich Picture Gallery, London & Kimbell Art Museum, Paul Holberton, Fort Worth, Texas 2010. See in particular Helen Langdon: “The Art and Life of Salvator Rosa”, pp. 11-49 and Xavier F. Salomon: “Ho Fatto Spiritali Roma”, pp. 74-99, in particular pp. 82-85. The exhibition catalogue is hereinafter referred to as “London & Fort Worth 2010”.
4. Timothy M. Costelloe, ed.: The Sublime from Antiquity to the Present, Cambridge University Press 2012, pp. 1-7.
5. Dietmar Till: Das Doppelte Erhabene. Eine Argumentationsfigur von Antike bis zum Beginn des 19. Jahrhunderts, Max Niemeyer Verlag, Tübingen 2006, p. 413.
6. In order to delimit this study to fit applicable constraints, later art theoreticians have not been included here. Choosing Vasary as the cut-off point is justified by the fact that Salvator Rosa is known to have been familiar with Vasari’s books.
7. Richard W. Wallace: “Salvator Rosa’s ‘Democritus’ and ‘L’Humana Fragilita’”, The Art Bulletin, Vol. 50, March 1968, p. 25; regarding learned friends with archaeological insights that Rosa may have consulted, see also Langdon in: London & Fort Worth 2010, pp. 31f.
8. Zahle 1937, p. 151; Salvatore Rosa and Festa Borrelli: Lettere – Salvatore Rosa, Testi Storici, Filosofici E Letterari Istituto Italiano per Gli Studi Storici 12, Il Mulino, Bologna 2003, no. 73, pp. 80f., letter dated 3/10 1650.
9. Since the 1630s, public exhibitions at the Pantheon had been arranged by Congregazione dei Virtuosi, a church-run cultural academy for the promotion of Christian art. One of the chapels in the Pantheon was dedicated to Saint Joseph, patron saint of the society, and so the day of Saint Joseph, 19 March, was chosen as the annual date of the exhibition. Regarding Salvator Rosa’s monumental paintings, which he presented to the general public at the exhibitions in the Pantheon and at other exhibitions celebrating the saints at various churches. Haskell: Patrons and painters – a Study in the Relations Between Italian Art and Society in the Age of the Baroque, Yale University Press, New Haven 1980, pp. 140ff.; Xavier Salomon in: London & Fort Worth 2010, pp. 74-77; 80–94.

10.

For a detailed account of the sale, see Erik Zahle, Kunstmuseets Aarsskrift, s. 145-155; Lettere 2003, nr. 92, pp. 98f., letter dated 18/4 1651.

11.

Richard W. Wallace: The etchings of Salvator Rosa, Princeton, N.J. 1979, Democritus: pp. 261-266, ill. p. 263; Diogenes: pp. 257-258. ill. p. 259; Cf.: P. Bellini: Italian Masters of the Seventeenth Century (The Illustrated Bartsch 46 (commentary)) Abaris, New York 1985, Cat. 005, pp. 342f. and cat. 007, pp. 345f. The engravings are reversed compared to the paintings due to the printing technique. Both engravings are part of the Royal Collection of Graphic Arts, the National Gallery of Denmark.

12.

”Democrito, in atto di contemplare gran quantità di scheletri, ed altre cosa consumate”; Wendy Wassing Roworth: “Pictor Succensor” A Study of Salvator Rosa as Satirist, Cynic and Painter, Garland Publishing, Inc., New York & London 1978, p. 273, no. 3.

13.

Zahle 1937, pp. 145-155; Roworth 1978, pp. 274f.

14.

Wallace 1968, pp. 21-32; In his biography Jonathan Scott specifically points to the vanitas theme in the Democritus painting, drawing parallels to Dürer and Castiglione. Cf. Jonathan Scott: Salvator Rosa – His Life and times, Yale University Press, New Haven 1995, pp. 95-100.

15.

Roworth 1978, pp. 284-286.

16.

Roworth 1978, p. 286.

17.

Raymond Klibansky, Erwin Panofsky and Fritz Saxl: Saturn and Melancholy – Studies in the History of Natural Philosophy, Religion and Art, Nelson 1964, p. 374, no. 2, fig. 112. This frontispiece first appears in the 1628 edition and was etched by Le Blon.

18.

Haskell 1980, pp. 203-241.

19.

London & Fort Worth 2010, pp. 74-99.

20.

Nicola Spinosa: Salvator Rosa - Tra Mito E Magia, Museo Di Capodimonte, Electa, Naples 2008; Caterina Volpi: “Filosofo nel dipingere: Salvator Rosa tra Roma e Firenze (1639-1659)”; op.cit., pp. 28-46, regarding the pendants see especially pp. 36-37. Hereinafter the exhibition catalogue is quoted as ”Naples 2008”.

21.

Sybille Ebert-Schifferer: ”Il teatro filosofico della vanità. Le iconografie di Salvator Rosa”; Naples 2008, pp. 66-82, in particular pp. 71, 73 og 76.

22.
Francesco Lofano: "Salvator Rosa e il tema del Democritus Cogitans", Sybill Ebert-Schifferer, Helen Langdon, Caterina Volpi, eds.: Salvator Rosa E Il Suo Tempo 1615-1673, Campisano, Rome 2010, pp. 235-242.
23.
Caterina Volpi: Salvator Rosa (1615-1673) "Pittore famoso". Ugo Bozzi Editore, Rome 2014, cat. 162-163, 480-482, pp. 245-252.
24.
London & Fort Worth 2010, pp. 197-198.
25.
Helen Langdon has addressed his landscapes from the 1660s and his magic and prophetic subjects, see London & Fort Worth 2010, pp. 126-135; and "The Demosthenes of Painting. Salvator Rosa", Caroline van Eck et al., eds.: Translations of the sublime - the early modern reception and dissemination of Longinus' Peri Hupsous in rhetoric, the visual arts, architecture and the theatre, Intersections 24, Brill, Boston 2012, p. 163-185.
26.
Scott 1995, p. 98, quotes a correspondence between Rosa and Ricciardi, aimed at finding a suitable and innovative subject after completing his work on Democritus.
27.
Langdon 2012, p. 164, no. 6: concerning Salvator Rosa and the cultural fraternity Gli Umoristi (including Alessandro Tassoni and Paganino Gaudenzio) and the Barberinis as key figures. Langdon also points to this circle's interest in Longinus: G. Costa: "Appunti sulla fortuna del Pseudo-Longino: Alessandro Tassoni e Paganino Gaudenzio", Studi Seicenteschi 25, 1984, pp. 123-143.
28.
Leone Allacci: Leonis Allatii De Erroribus Magnorum Virorum in Dicendo Dissertatio Rhetorica, Rome 1635. Allacci's treatise on rhetoric and the sublime can be found at the Royal Library in Copenhagen. Among antiquity's writers of treatises on the theory of style and the sublime the book mentions Hermogenes and Demosthenes at least as often as it mentions Longinus. Allacci also quotes from the classics of rhetoric – Quintilian and Cicero. A wealth of other names from the realms of ancient poetry and philosophy is also scattered throughout the text.
29.
Volpi in: Naples 2008, p. 29.
30.
Scott 1995, pp. 67-68. Even though he was learned within a wide range of arts subjects, Ricciardi was only appointed Reader in moral philosophy at the university in Pisa late in life. Until that point he mostly lived in Florence, where he – like Salvator Rosa – was part of the intelligentsia.
31.
For examples by Giuseppe de Ribera, Velázquez and Netherlandish role models, see Diederik Bakhuijs et al.: Varia. Les Curieux Philosophes de Velázquez et de Ribera, exhibition catalogue, Musée des Beaux-Arts Rouen, Lyon 2005.
32.
Zahle 1937, p. 150, quotes part of the letter. See also Scott 1995, p. 97. The literary basis for the subject is stated to be Hippocrates's apocryphal letter to Demagetus, which was widely known in the seventeenth century and quoted in Robert Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, 1621.

33.

At this point in time there was a tradition in art for depicting both philosophers together. There are surviving examples of juxtapositions of Diogenes and Hippocrates in Dutch seventeenth-century art that date back to depiction by Elsheimer, see Richard W. Wallace: "Salvator Rosa's 'Democritus' and 'L'Humana Fragilita'", The Art Bulletin, Vol. 50, March 1968, pp. 21-32, p. 24. A painting of Democritus and Hippocrates painted by Pieter Lastman (1583–1633) and dated 1622 was acquired in 2013 by Musée des Beaux Arts, Lille. For other examples of Democritus and Hippocrates together, see Wallace 1968, p. 24, no. 32.

34.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, pp. 421f.

35.

Penelope Murray: "Poetic Genius and its Classical Origins", Penelope Murray, ed.: Genius, the History of an Idea, Basil Blackwell, Oxford 1989, pp. 18, 21.

36.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, p. 421.

37.

Karsten Friis Johansen and Carl Henrik Kock: Den Europæiske Filosofis Historie, I-II, Nyt Nordisk Forlag, Copenhagen 1991 (1996). Vols. I-II, vol. I, pp. 554-556; Richard Parry: "Ancient Ethical Theory", Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, 2014.

38.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, pp. 254, 257.

39.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, p. 240.

40.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, p. 262.

41.

The students included the philosophers Phocion the Good, Stilpo of Megara and Monim of Syracuse. Laertses 1811, vol. I, pp. 262, 264.

42.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, pp. 251f., p. 257.

43.

Zahle 1937, p. 150.

44.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, p. 245.

45.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, p. 245.

46.

Laertses 1811, vol. I, p. 246.

47.
The founder of Stoicism, Zeno (335–265 BC) was greatly influenced by the outlook of life adopted by Diogenes and the other Cynics. Friis Johansen 1996, p. 554.
48.
Jason Lewis Saunders: Justus Lipsius, The Philosophy of Renaissance Stoicism, Liberal Arts Press, New York 1955, pp. 218-219.
49.
”Scrisi i sensi d’un cor sincero, e bianco: / Che s’in vaghezza poi manca lo stile, / Nel Zelo al meno, e ne l’amor non manco.” La Pittura, p. 254, verses 849-852.
50.
”Ma chi sá quel che io chiamo ignoranza / Non sia de’Grandi un’invenzion morale, / Per fuggir la superbia, e l’arroganza!” La Pittura, p. 233, verses 262-264.
51.
Scott 1995, p. 68, fig. 83. Scott believes that the painting depicts his friend Ricciardi, but this is contradicted by the museum itself, which describes it as a self-portrait in the sign accompanying it. Helen Langdon also believes the painting to be a self-portrait, cf. London & Fort Worth 2010, cat.no. 5, ill. pp. 115-116.
52.
Regarding Salvator Rosa’s view of himself as a painter, satirist and Stoic, as expressed in this allegorical self-portrait, see Richard W. Wallace: ”The Genius of Salvator Rosa”, ”The Art Bulletin, 1965, pp. 471-480, especially p. 474; The Illustrated Bartsch 1985, Salvator Rosa (4512), pp. 374 f., no. 025 [B.24 (277)] where the woman with the dove is identified as La Sincerità; and most recently: Maria Rosaria Nappi, Gregorio Angelini, and Istituto Nazionale per La Grafica, Museo Dell'Istituto: ”Rosa-Rame - Salvator Rosa Incisore Nelle Collezioni Dell'Istituto Nazionale per La Grafica, Etchings by Salvator Rosa in the Collections of the Istituto Nazionale per La Grafica, Gangemi Editore, Rom 2014, pp. 137-141.
53.
The iconography of Sincerity and Freedom is derived from Ripa’s Iconologia, Scott 1995, p. 166, figs. 167-168.
54.
Laërtes 1811, vol. I, p. 245.
55.
Dietmar Till: Das Doppelte Erhabene. Eine Argumentationsfigur von Antikke bis zum beginn des 19. Jahrhunderts, Max Niemeyer Verlag, Tübingen 2006, p. 90.
56.
Salvator Rosa: Poesie E Lettere Edite E Inedite Di Salvator Rosa, Naples 1892, p. 255. Towards the end of the satire La Pittura (On Painting), in the last stanza but four, the artist describes his own painting: ”Siasi pur il mio stil sublime, ò vile, / À color che sferzan sò che non gusta: / sempre i palati amareggiò la bile”.
57.
Salvator Rosa, ”Poesie, 1892, p. 228, 236, 250: ”Presi già sono i luoghi più sublimi / Et il proverbio publico risuona: / In ogn’ arte, e mestier beati i primi” (La Poesia, lines 136–138); ”Per sublime materia [sublimi materie] hanno disposto, / Dietro a Dion [Bion] Pitagora, et Antemio, / Lodar le rape, le cipolle, e ’l mosto.” (La Poesia, lines 334–336); ”Più sublime materia un di vi spinga / E si tralasci andar buggie cercando, /

Nè più follie Genio [genio Dirceo], ò Murcea vi finga. / (La Poesia, lines 730–732).

58.

La Pittura, p. 233, lines 262-264.

59.

In reference works on the history of aesthetics, the concept of sublime is often treated from the time of and on the basis of Despréaux-Boileau's translation of Longinus, see e.g. Karlheinz Barck, Dieter Kliche, Britta Hofmann eds.: Ästhetische Grundbegriffe – Historisches Wörterbuch in Sieben Bänden, Verlag J.B. Metzler, Stuttgart, Weimar 2000; Jörg Heininger: Erhaben, vol. 2, 2001, pp. 275-310. The present study of the aesthetic concept of the sublime also employs the following secondary sources: Till 2006, who considers Longinus's Peri Hýpsous as seen in an ancient rhetorical-theoretical context and through a Protestant lens; Philip Shaw: The Sublime, The new Critical Idiom, Routledge, New York 2006. Shaw offers a chronological survey of the concept of the sublime from antiquity to postmodernism with particular emphasis on eighteenth-century English literature; Malcolm Heath: Longinus and the Ancient Sublime, Timothy M. Costelloe, ed.: The Sublime from Antiquity to the Present, Cambridge University Press 2012. The anthology considers the concept through the lens of the history of philosophy; D.A. Russell's introduction and notes to the Greek text in the 1964 edition, Cassius Longinus and D.A. Russell: Longinus; On the Sublime, Clarendon, Oxford 1964.

60.

Caroline van Eck et al. 2012.

61.

Russell 1964, pp. XXII-XXIII. Russell's edition includes the original Greek text. In the present article, the review of Longinus's concept of the sublime is based on William Smith's 1739 English translation of the Greek text. William Smith's thorough translation (which according to Smith was nine years in the making and the subject of many reworkings and critical perusals by friends) is the first literal translation into English of the Greek original text. I have chosen to use this old translation because it seems more in keeping with seventeenth-century frames of reference than later translations. Using Smith's translation means that one can be certain that the choices of word and various nuances in the translation are not influenced by Edmund Burke's (1729–97) or Immanuel Kant's (1724–1804) definitions of the sublime. In his preface Smith points out that Despréaux-Boileau's translation into French is not always true to Longinus's text, and that previous English editions (J. Hall 1652, author unknown 1698) were based on the French translation. Quite in the spirit of Longinus, the preface ends by Smith stating his hopes and reservations concerning its reception: .. if I have the good Fortune to contribute a little towards the fixing a true judicious Taste, and enabling my Readers to distinguish Sense from Sound, Grandeur from Pomp, and the Sublime from Fustian and Bombast, I shall think my Time well spent, and shall be ready to submit to the Censures of a Judge, but shall only smile at the Snarling of what is commonly called a Critic.

62.

Hana Gründler: Orrore, terrore, timore. Vasari und das Erhabene, Caroline van Eck et al. 2012, pp. 83-116.

63.

Russell 1964, pp. XXII-XXIII.

64.

Robert Doran: The theory of the Sublime. From Longinus to Kant. Cambridge University Press 2015, p. 29.

65.
Russell 1964, p. IX.
66.
Longinus 1739, p. 1-3.
67.
Longinus 1739, p. 15.
68.
Longinus 1739, pp. 14f.
69.
Longinus 1739, p. 16.
70.
Longinus 1739, pp. 16-18. Longinus addresses these sources in greater detail in the chapters that follow.
71.
Longinus 1739, chapter 8, p. 16.
72.
Regarding Ps.-Demetrius and Hermogenes, see Till 2006, p. 90.
73.
Till 2006, p. 90. In keeping with Longinus's phrasing "Gifts of Nature", Till sees the two key sources of sublimity (grandeur of thought/the pathos of ideas and affects) as belonging to the realm of natura/phýsis.
74.
Longinus 1739, pp. 1-3, pp. 18-27. Heath 2012, pp. 20-21 on "The Ethics of Sublimity";
75.
Russell 1964, introduction p. xxii.
76.
Plato, The Republic, 4:427ff.
77.
Vasari 2004, pp. 274f.
78.
Longinus 1739, pp. 102-108; regarding the famous dialogue in the last chapter, see Till 2006, p. 98.
79.
Till 2006, p. 98.
80.
Longinus 1739, p. 105.
81.
Longinus 1739, p. 106.

82.
Giorgio Vasari: Kunstgeschichte und Kunsttheorie, introduction, comments and glossary of concepts by Matteo Burioni and Sabine Feser, Verlag Klaus Wagenbach, Berlin 2004, p. 209. In the present article Vasari is used as a reference to early modern art theory's understanding of the concept of the sublime and all the other closely related concepts associated with that concept. The choice rests on the fact that an interesting link between Vasari's texts and Longinus's concept of the sublime has been pointed out, see Hana Gründler in: Translations of the Sublime, 2012, pp. 83-116.
83.
For a definition of the concept, see Vasari 2004, pp. 185f.
84.
Vasari 2004, pp. 274f.
85.
Klibansky, Erwin Panofsky and Fritz Saxl: Saturn and Melancholy – Studies in the History of Natural Philosophy, Religion, and Art, Nelson, London 1964, pp. 42-43.
86.
Klibansky, Erwin Panofsky and Fritz Saxl 1964, p. 42; Murray, Oxford 1989, p. 10.
87.
The first exemplary iconological interpretation of Albrecht Dürer's famous print, see Erwin Panofsky and Fritz Saxl: Dürers 'Melencolia I': Eine quellen- und typengeschichtliche Untersuchung (Studien der Bibliothek Warburg, 2), B. G. Teubner, Leipzig and Berlin 1923; and the later, expanded and English edition Klibansky, Erwin Panofsky and Fritz Saxl 1964, pp. 317-373. According to the authors, Dürer was, with his belief in 'divine inspiration', in opposition to early Italian Renaissance figures such as Alberti and Leonardo da Vinci, who wanted to see artistic creativity as rational and bound by rules because this would place painting on a par with the free arts. The full title of Albrecht Dürer's treatise is Underweysung Der Messung Mit Dem Zirkel Und Richtscheyt in Linien, Ebenen Und Gantzen Corporen, Nuremberg 1525.
88.
Klibansky, Erwin Panofsky and Fritz Saxl 1964, pp. 360-365. Longinus's On the Sublime and his theory concerning the innate (as opposed to learned) sources of the sublime is not part of the Klibansky, Erwin Panofsky and Fritz Saxl analysis.
89.
Perry Chapman: Rembrandt's Self-portraits – a Study in Seventeenth-Century Identity. Princeton University Press, Princeton, New Jersey 1990, pp. 21-33; Chapman includes references to Robert Burton and Albrecht Dürer and brings together a range of painted and etched self-portraits by Rembrandts as examples of this melancholic identity, figs. 23, 26, 27.
90.
Wallace 1968, p. 21, fig. 5. The print can be found in the Royal Collection of Graphic Arts, inv. no. G:63,19. The print can be found in the Royal Collection of Graphic Art, inv. no. G:63,19. Chris Fischer has explored the relation between Castiglione's engraving and Salvator Rosa's Democritus painting, in particular Salvator Rosa's engraving after the painting, see: Chris Fischer: Ruinmani, Lommebog 68, Den Kongelige Kobberstiksamling, Statens Museum for Kunst. Copenhagen 1995, pp. 4-8.
91.
Vasari 2004, pp. 240f. and pp. 197f.

92.

Chiaroscuro, in the sense of the distribution of light and shadow in the scene, became particularly prominent in the seventeenth century. This distinctive manner of painting became a means of creating unity in the composition and of achieving a particular expressive or metaphorical quality. For an interpretation of the concept of chiaroscuro in Baroque art, see Maria Rzepinska: "Tenebrism in Baroque Painting and its Ideological Background", artibus et historiae, 13, 1986, pp. 91-112.

About the author

Eva de la Fuente Pedersen

Eva de la Fuente Pedersen, Senior Curator, PhD, National Gallery of Denmark Before entering the curatorial staff at the National Gallery of Denmark in 2003 with the responsibility of European painting and sculpture before 1800, Eva de la Fuente Pedersen worked at the National Museum of Denmark 1992-2003 and taught Art History at the University of Copenhagen 1998-2003. She obtained the title of master in 1991 and doctor (PhD) in 1998 with a thesis on 16th and 17th century wood carved sculpture in Denmark. As a curator at the National Gallery of Denmark she has published research on Rembrandt, The Royal Danish Kunstkammer, Jacob Jordaens, Dieric Bouts and Dutch and Flemish floral still lifes.

- eva.pedersen@smk.dk